THE LIVING CHESS-MEN.

A Desperate Game for Life or Death in India.

"This game reminds me of a grea chese-game that I once played," said the Captain, as he checkmated his opponent's king and drew back in his chair to begin a story. 'It was the great game of my life," he continued. "The whole matter and I shall never forget it. In fact we were playing with living chess-men. You don't believe it, eb? Well, just listen to my story, and you'll think such playing as this mere fooling."

We had been playing for nearly two hours, and the Captain's skill had won. His love for the game of chess was only second to his love for his profession, and his life as a soldier had given him plenty of opportunities to gratify his passion in this particular.

"You remember I spent a couple of years in India, when a young fellow, and during that time I met with many adventures that none of you have ever heard, Although I have seen considerable service since then, and some hard work and fighting, I think, on the whole, that
